FCC gives leadership PME

Marines gathered in the Depot Theater Friday for a period of professional military education on leadership given by a representative of the Franklin Covey Company.

Hoke M. Rose, the guest speaker of Franklin Covey and the senior business consultant at the company, was sent to Parris Island to inform Marines on the proper attitude and beliefs for the work place.

Rose approached the incorrect belief held by some people that “men are better than women” through role-play.

“If you think men are better than women, how will that affect you and your leadership ability when you get a female coworker?” Rose asked during the PME.

Rose made his point by encouraging Marines to look at both sides of the situation. The Marines also participated in the instructional period by taking notes and answering into the questions Rose asked.

Another subject Rose brought out was the Belief Window. The Belief Window states that beliefs affect automatic behaviors and decisions. According to the Galileo Reality Model, there are six principles to remember. The first principle is when the results of behavior do not meet needs, there is an incorrect belief in the Belief Window.

The second and third principles to remember, results take time to measure and growth is the process of changing beliefs on the Belief Window, require patience and maturity when correcting the incorrect belief.

The Reality Model also states the fourth principle, addictive behavior, is the result of deep and unmet needs. The fifth principle explains that self-worth is not supposed to be dependent on anything external.

Remembering these principles assists in the last principle of the model, which is when the results of behavior do meet needs over time and inner peace is experienced.

Franklin Covey offered the seminar free to Marines, although Rose said the company normally charges thousands of dollars for a similar period of instruction.

Rose added the company is trying to rebuild the leadership qualities and enhance the core values among individuals and service members.
